George Gillespie is a Licensing Associate for Innovation Partners. He is a technology commercialization professional with more than 20 years of experience in university and federal settings (University of Maryland, University of Houston and Army Research Lab). He has formed collaborations to develop early stage university technologies leveraging such funding sources as SBIR/STTR and negotiated and brought to conclusion more than 25 commercialization agreements bringing in approximately $2.5M in research funding/royalty revenue for academic and federal organizations.

George helped to put in place the first industrial Cooperative R&D Agreement at the Army's Harry Diamond Lab. He enjoys working with faculty and students in providing advice on IP protection and commercialization strategies.

George received a MA in both Science and Technology Policy from George Washington University and Theology from Christendom College. He also holds a BS in Geology from Rutgers University.
